An Evening Echo.
The perfectly balanced man would be a nonentity. To be interesting or to accomplish anything in the world a certain amount of oneness, enthusiasm or partisanship is essential. —BRUCE CALVERT.

Midsummer Mentality.
Midsummer has been called the silly season. There is a reason. The heat and the humidity seem to enervate and weaken both the physical being and the moral stamina, says the Cleveland Plain Dealer, and a general letting down of ideas and intelligence results.

In the silly season the gold brick buyer fraternizes with the fleecer. In the silly season the yokel feels the lure of the green goods circular. In the silly season the matrimony bureau reaps its golden harvest. Only the other day a pleasant stranger sold the biggest hotel in Chicago to an Indiana man for $200. Only the other day a Pennsylvania innocent gave a tramp ten crisp "tens" for a ring which two gentlemanly passersby assured him was worth $1,000.

Examples could be multiplied. They have no territorial limitations. They are quite as likely to happen in Boston as in Kankakee. Nobody who has reached the age of discretion—the expression is used with due forethought—is entirely exempt. Where lies the safeguard, in eternity or in close observation of the daily chronicle of the tricks and traps which the wicked prepare for the stumbling victim.

When the tempter approaches reverse the famous formula—don't stop, don't look, don't listen.

War Protection.
The protection to American industries afforded by the European war is well illustrated in the report of the department of labor recently made public, on foreign food prices as affected by the war—bulletin No. 170. The report shows that administrative and legislative measures to check the rise in the cost of necessities were very generally taken in Denmark, Egypt, Greece and Turkey, Italy, Russia, Spain and Turkey prohibited the export of practically all foodstuffs. France, Norway and Sweden listed certain articles which must not be exported, and Holland placed an embargo on butter and cheese.

The embargo placed by Great Britain on Australian exports of fresh meats to the United States destroyed the hopes of an organized attempt on the part of meat producers in that country to take advantage of the Underwood free trade convention on fresh meats. As a result, Germany practically ceased to exist as soon as the blockade became effective. As a prominent western business man remarked: "The blood of Europe saved the country from another 1893."

Defense and Deficit.

The administration announces that it intends to lay before Congress "an adequate program" of national defense. This will cost money. The treasury deficit at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, was around $40,000,000. The deficit for the single month of July in the current fiscal year is close to half that sum. On the first of May, 1916, sugar goes upon the free list, which will entail a loss of revenue amounting to more than $10,000,000. On December 31, 1915, the so-called "war taxes" will expire by limitation, entailing a decrease of many more millions in revenue. Therefore it is plainly to be seen that, whether we provide for national defense or not, increased revenue must be had.

The Democratic leaders are considering this question. They plan to put a tax on tea, on coffee, on bananas, and on several other articles of common consumption. In other words they intend to tax every man's table. When the Democrats took over the government they found a full treasury and ample revenues. They found, too, a steady program of naval construction and other items of national defense. In two short years they have emptied the treasury, have diminished the revenues, have crippled the navy and the army, and now, when the question of defense looms up they can deal with it only after they have dealt with a deficit. The real way to handle both questions, defense and the deficit, is

How to Succeed.
We have been a nation of spendthrifts long enough. —Roger W. Babson.

George D. Dayton, one of the leading business men of Minneapolis, tells this inspiring story of his success through saving:
"I left home shortly after 16 years of age. Before reaching 22 years of age I had accumulated $5,000 ($2,000 of which had been given by father in lieu of a college course), and felt that it was safe to marry. At that time I was receiving a salary of $800 per year, payable weekly. I wrote and I decided that we would not open a charge account anywhere, would pay cash for what we bought and would go without things we could not pay for until we could pay for them. Furthermore, we decided that each Saturday we would lay aside $5 for a permanent investment, and nothing was permitted to tempt us from the habit while on a salary."

"When we went to housekeeping only a part of the house was furnished—some rooms were kept closed until we could buy carpets and needed furniture. Many young couples think they must establish themselves in well-furnished apartments in order to get into society, but we were welcomed into the same refined, intelligent circles in which our parents had always moved, and this without any pretense of having more than we possessed."

"When about $200 or so had accumulated a mortgage was bought for $400 or $500, the balance being paid as quickly as possible. The interest on each mortgage swelled the income that much and the salary increased some—until in 1883 we moved to Minnesota and invested all in land."

"A young man has no right to marry until he has saved something. To all their income. Every man owes it to society to save something for his family. Men on salaries can do this if they will, but it requires on the part of both husband and wife will power sufficient to be content and happy while living inside the income, whatever that is."

Mr. Dayton's experience was related in connection with an interesting discussion in the Minneapolis Journal brought forth by a letter written to the paper by a man who signed himself "Billpayer." The correspondent asked how he could save part of his salary, explaining that his income was a little more than enough for his needs. He had repeatedly tried to save but had never made much headway. His case is typical of many others. Have you solved the problem yet?

TRAVELETTE

By W. L. H. H.

AQUA, VA.

There are some towns so tiny that only a few maps show where they are, and so apart from the world that few persons ever know of their existence; yet richer in stories of the past than any great city or town. For in these forgotten towns, the past is cherished and kept alive with loving care.

Such a town is Aqua, Virginia, within fifty miles of the national capital in fact; but fifty years away in spirit. A bit of a fringe station and a police office that looks like an overgrown cracker box are all that mark the location of Aqua. These may be said to constitute its downtown section. Before it lies the Potomac, a mile wide, placidly asleep. Behind it are hills covered with forests of oaks and oaks touched with faint purple mist. And between the hills and the river are rolling acres of fields, more than half of them lying fallow, which belong to some of the oldest, and once the finest estates in the South. There are houses still standing that were built before the revolution—substantial houses of wood and stone, with great stone fireplaces and massive chimneys built against the fickle Virginia winters, and wide-spreading sycamore trees flinging a generous mantle of shade over the porches and doorways during the summer. These houses are invariably perched on the hilltops, commanding a splendid view of the Potomac and the wooded bottoms and waving grain fields between.

Time was when prosperous planters sat upon these porches, and looked across well-filled acres, and saw laden rafts carrying the crops of their farms and the stone from their quarries up the river to Washington and down to Baltimore. In those days it was a populous region, and life was leisurely and fair. There were routes and balls in the great houses, and gentlemen rode to the hounds across the autumn hills, and the river boats carried the wives and daughters of the planters to Washington for the social season. But the war came, and all was changed. From such men as these came the proudest defenders of the South. They went forth and died almost to a man. After the war, Aqua was peopled by old men, and women and children, and scantily populated at that, for the young people quickly went away. And none have ever come back, nor have strangers moved in. Some of the farms are still managed by women. They are old women now, but they were wives and sweethearts when the war was fought. Of the war and the brave days before all they still talk. It is hardly too much to say that in those old days they still live. To the visitor, as he listens, the past seems to come back out of the shadows and lay a cold hand upon him, and hold him for the moment as its own.

Some men of money from the North have come to this beautiful region and bought of the rich lands lying fallow, and built houses there; but most of them have gone away again. Perhaps the hazy hills, and the river dreaming in the sun are too lovely for them. At any rate, they have left Aqua alone to her dreams of the glorious past.

MORE AMERICAN MUSEUMS.

The tremendous growth of popular interest in art in this country within the present generation is evidenced by the number of public galleries and museums which are being opened in American cities. A list of these institutions compiled in 1882, included only forty-one of note. Now there are nearly 500 and some of them are worth several million dollars each. Twelve notable museums have been opened in the last ten years, including three for this year. Two of these have already been dedicated, and that of Cleveland is nearly completed, and will be open for the fall season.

The Minneapolis Art Institute, which was dedicated in the late winter, includes a valuable collection of the best modern painting and sculpture, as well as specimens of various kinds of textile art. A school in connection with it trains art students for advanced work.

The Taylor Memorial Museum, just dedicated at Vassar College, New York, is the finest art building possessed by any American college. It is in Gothic architecture, and houses a fine collection of art and natural history specimens.

The Metropolitan Museum of New York ranks first in the United States, with a building valued at $3,000,000 and a $6,000,000 purchase fund from a single bequest, besides many smaller revenues.

THE DAILY NOVELETTE

ONCE A YEAR.

Simon Mish (an extremely busy man) was enjoying his first bath that year. He splashed luxuriously, enjoying the unwanted sensation. Suddenly the telephone bell rang. Simon Mish was alone in the house.

The telephone bell continued to ring. "Bother!" swore Simon Mish, and got out of the tub and went and answered it.

"Hello," said a strange voice. "Does Selig Wiffenbach live here?" Simon Mish slammed down the receiver and went back to his bath. (He was alone in the house.) Five minutes later the phone bell rang again. Again Simon Mish left his tub to answer.

"Hello," said a second strange voice. "Is this the Mickentoodle residence?" Simon Mish positively hurried down the receiver and went back to the tub. A minute later (he was alone in the house) it rang again.

For the third time, Simon Mish dozed in the tub and answered the telephone, and a third strange voice said, "Hello, may I speak to Rhudor Wishwasher?"

That evening Simon Mish had the thing taken out of the House. No, silly reader, not the telephone, the bath tub.
